Read the text about clothing.

Are you dressed to impress?

A

When I was walking along a crowded street in Berlin recently, a friend pointed out two people on the other side of the street. 'They're clearly British!' he said. I asked him how he could be so sure and he replied that it was obvious from their dress and style. Even in an apparently global world, our clothing habits are still deeply linked to culture. What we choose to wear communicates important information about ourselves – for example, our status – as well as about the values of our society. Whether we like it or not, our style of dress is influenced by our cultural background. Even people who choose to dress 'alternatively' have been influenced by culture. Their need to be different to the crowd may mean rejecting conventional styles, but they will often adopt a different set of conventions from a particular subculture that they are attracted to.

People's clothing may be determined by cultural traditions and have origins dating back hundreds of years, without us even realising! For ceremonies such as a wedding or a coming-of-age celebration, people may be required to dress in a certain way. Clothes like a Scout uniform or sports teamwear may identify people as belonging to a specific subculture. Alternatively, a uniform or special item of clothing may tell people what job you do. The colours you wear may also be influenced by your culture. A colour that is seen as elegant or lucky in some parts of the world can mean the opposite in others. In China, red is a lucky colour that is often worn by brides on their wedding day, but in many countries a bride wearing anything but white would be unusual.

C

Views of what represents appropriate clothing have changed significantly over time, often reflecting changing values in society. For example, in many western societies, it used to be unacceptable for women to wear trousers in public and, if you look back at photos of any European city up to the 1950s, it is clear that few men felt comfortable going outdoors without a hat. Of course, trouser-wearing women and hatless men are now a common sight in this region. In the end, clothing habits have always been linked to what any particular culture decides is acceptable at the time. This may apply to how long shorts or skirts should be, what parts of the body can be exposed and indeed whether ripped jeans are acceptable at all.

D

It is not just the clothes themselves but ideas about how or when they should be worn that vary according to different cultural values. In business meetings in many countries men are still expected to wear a tie and jacket, but is it acceptable for them to remove their jacket when working in temperatures of 30°C (86°F)? An overseas relative attending a funeral in Britain might wear colourful clothes rather than black to the ceremony, but this might be considered by UK family members as not appropriate. The problem is that dress codes are specific to a culture and are nearly always unwritten, but understanding them can really help us feel comfortable when interacting with people in that culture.
