Read the four texts about sport.

A

Healthy bodies, healthy minds. It is well-known that regular physical activity is important for young people. It improves their health and reduces the risk of disease throughout their lives, as physically active children are more likely to remain active into adulthood. There are, however, many other benefits that are less well-known. Young people who do regular exercise have better concentration and therefore perform better in school. Furthermore, studies have shown that regular exercise increases confidence in both young people and adults. Sports clubs encourage young people to collaborate in team sports, and promote important social skills such as respect for others and how to interact effectively with them. They learn teamwork and problem-solving skills that will be useful in all areas of their lives. Sports organisations are especially important for disadvantaged young people, helping them build a valuable support network and feel part of a wider community, as individuals from a range of different backgrounds are given the opportunity to come together.

B

Kingsmeadow Sports Club. The Kingsmeadow Sports Club is an inner-city sports centre especially designed to cater for young people in the area. We realise that it is getting harder to fit sport in around your schoolwork. That's why we offer really flexible membership for all our main sports, so if you can't make it one week, we'll still be there the next. We have a great 25-metre pool and gym, and school-aged members are allowed free use of both up to 5 p.m. We offer training for athletics, martial arts and tennis. Indoor fitness classes are also available. Remember, sport isn't just about winning! We encourage a strong sense of community for members through regular social activities and weekend camps. Come and visit us to find out more!

C

Training with the best. It's six o'clock on a Sunday morning and I'd normally be fast asleep in bed, but this weekend I'm at a training camp with a group of young triathletes preparing for a triathlon, a challenging race which involves swimming, cycling and running various distances. We're having breakfast now. Everybody's talking about the day ahead and there's a real sense of excitement. The athletes seem very close and at ease with each other, even though they hadn't met until a couple of months ago. The triathletes normally meet up on weekday evenings and they have to fit their schoolwork around their training. I manage to do all the activities in the morning, but by lunchtime I'm exhausted. The others are not, however, and they're already planning the rest of the day, laughing and chatting. The way they support each other is probably the thing I'll remember the most from today.

Dear Ms Kerridge, I am writing regarding the council's plans to sell off several school playing fields to build housing. In recent years, we have increasingly seen sports facilities being taken away from schools, with the result that young people become unfit. Moreover, they are more likely to become involved in anti-social activity through boredom. I believe this is a decision that the council will regret. Sport has a key role to play in keeping our young people healthy and responsibility for this cannot be passed onto private sports clubs. I look forward to receiving your comments. Ashya Garcia
